We are going on a guided tour in “Living Places” in Copenhagen.

At VELUX, they believe it's time to rethink how buildings can help resolve global climate and health challenges through sustainable solutions and practical action.

Together with their partners EFFEKT and Artelia, they set out to make an impact on the building industry. An industry accounting for up to 40% of global energy consumption and CO2 emissions.

Welcome to Living Places Copenhagen - an experimental living environment that shows we do not have to wait for future technology to construct healthier, more sustainable buildings for people alongside planet.

The exhibition consists of seven prototypes - five open pavilions and two completed homes - showcasing our proposition for healthy, ultra-low carbon homes and communities.

Each prototype has its own specific program, curated to show the synergy between how we live in homes and communities, and the role of buildings herein.

Copenhagen's harbour has always played a central role in the city, reflecting its spirit. Once a fishermen's and merchants' port, it since evolved into an industrial dock before transforming into a cultural and recreative space.

The harbour front has been kept open for public access, and it's possible to walk or cycle around the entire harbour basin, crossing the many bike bridges on your way.

Over the past 25 years, the city of Copenhagen has taken measures that have resulted in the improvement of the water quality of its former industrial harbour, turning it into today's recreational harbour with watersports.
